Higher temperatures and humidity inside a vehicle are uncomfortable and can be very dangerous for your dog.

Never leave your dog in a parked car. Even on a cool day, the temperature inside a car can reach dangerous levels within a few minutes even with the windows cracked open or the car running and the air conditioner on.

It is not just the temperature that can harm your dog, but also the humidity.

Your dog does not sweat the way you do. They only sweat through their paws and some bare skin.

The primary way your dog cools off is through panting.

Your dog pants to evaporate moisture from their lungs. This creates a cooling effect and takes heat away from their body. When the heat and humidity is too high, they may not be able to cool themselves this way and their temperature can rise quickly to dangerous levels.

An increase in your dog's body temperature causes excessive discomfort and can lead to heatstroke. Heatstroke can lead to kidney and brain damage.

It's not only parked cars you have to be concerned with, heatstroke can happen in any hot environment.

Dogs left outside need shade, plenty of water to drink and preferably a small wading pool filled with cool water.

Doghouses do not usually provide your dog an efficient way to cool off. A large shade tree or wood roof with four legs would be a better way to provide shade.

Dogs can also rest under a deck or dig into the cool earth to cool off.

You also need to be cautious exercising with your dog. If you need to take a drink, most likely so does your dog. If you are feeling hot, your dog probably is too.
